Reasons for comment:

Comments: The south elevation of the extension is where the deviation from the original plan is most observable - it is at least 11 courses higher than planned. The result is that the new wall is more overbearing than expected. This is unfortunate.

In the document "Proposed Elevations BP_011_P_GE_01 Rev P4" The "Proposed Side (South) Elevation" shows 4 windows, two new ones on the ground floor (modified from the previously approved plan), and two new first floor windows which all face our property and overlook us at close proximity.

The floor to ceiling window on the ground floor that is furthest right in the "Proposed Side (South) Elevation" mentioned above is close to the boundary and directly faces our living room window. The upper part of the window creates a direct view between the interiors of the two properties which intrudes into the privacy of our home. The current foliage from our wisteria mitigates this problem considerably in Summer, but once the wisteria dies back / is pruned, privacy will be a concern for at least six months of the year.

Overall, our view is that obscured glass in the new window facing our living room window would be a reasonable compromise.

Kind regards
